THE WESTERN KENTUCKY MINERS WIN A VICTORY

In the Matter of a Mine Wage
Scale When the Operators
Change to Machine.

Bowling Green, Ky., Feb. 22.—Judge McKenzie Moss has rendered his decision in the arbitration matter submitted to him on last Saturday by Western Kentucky coal operators and their employees, in which he sustained the contention of the miners. His opinion is in writing, and deals with the subject at considerable length, but, briefly stated, the controversy grows out of a contract made in April, 1912, between the miners and the operators, by which a certain scale of wages was agreed upon, and in which it was stipulated that "no local condition shall be changed that will, in any manner, further increase the cost of production or decrease the earning capacity of the men."

Thereafter the owners of the mine at Spottsville, Ky., installed machines in the mine and changed from the pick method of mining to the machine method, and the miners contended that, using the machines, they are compelled to perform certain services for which they receive no pay, and that in other respects the earning capacity of the men has been materially decreased by the change.

Judge Moss was selected and agreed upon by both sides as arbitrator in the premises to settle the controversy, and he reached the conclusion from the record submitted to him, that it is not possible for the miners, employing the same time, energy and skill, to earn as much under the new method as they were capable of earning under the conditions that existed at the time the contract was entered into, and he decides that, under the contract, the operators should not be permitted to make such a change, at the expense of the miners, no matter how advantageous it may be to the operators. The effect of this decision will compel the mine owners, whenever they change from the pick method to the machine method, to arrange a system of compensation by which the wage earner can make the same wages working with the machines that he made under the former method of mining.

In so far as installing machines in mines, the decision affects fully 6,000 miners in Western Kentucky who are working under a similar contract.

POOLING AGREEMENTS MUCH STRENGTHENED

Higher Court Holds They Can
Be Enforced In Equity
By Injunction.

Frankfort, Ky., Feb. 20.—Tobacco pools were greatly strengthened to-day by a decision in the Court of Appeals, holding that pooling agreements are such as can be enforced in equity by injunction, an entirely new question in Kentucky, when the pooling contracts contain a provision that "upon failure to fully comply with the terms and agreement of the contract," the pooler agrees to pay the society as liquidated 20 per cent. of the value of the tobacco for the benefit of the members of the society.

The case was the Grant county Board of Control and the Burley Tobacco Society against A. S. Allphinn, in which the Fayette Circuit Court is reversed. Allphinn was accused of shipping his tobacco to Lexington to be sold out of the pool. His pooling contract contained such provision, and the court said the question presented was "whether a court of equity may enjoin a breach of contract, notwithstanding the provision for specific damages therefor," and decided that the answer depends upon whether it was the intention of the parties that the contract should be fulfilled or whether it was to be optional either to fulfill the contract or pay the sum stipulated as liquidated damages. In this case the court held that it must have been the intention of the parties to fulfill the contract, and that the sum stipulated was merely security that the contract would be lived up to.

"The very life of the undertaking on which the appetites were engaged depended upon whether or not a considerable number of growers would pool their tobacco for sale through the appellants," said the court. "If the poolers were allowed to sell in violation of the contract, the aim of the pool would be defeated, and the sum agreed upon would not liquidate the damages or be an adequate compensation."
